ZOODUNNIT?

>> Hunt on for suspect releasing animals

American police are investigating a series of suspicious incidents involving animals at a zoo in Dallas, Texas.

The latest mystery saw the disappearance of a pair of emperor tamarin monkeys, which zoo keepers said would normally stay close to home.

They were eventually found in an abandoned house 15 miles away and returned safely to the zoo.

A zoo spokesman said: "We are thrilled beyond belief to share that our two emperor tamarin monkeys have been found."

In the first incident at the zoo during January, a clouded leopard escaped from its enclosure through a hole that had been cut in fencing. The young creature was soon found safe and well.

Another hole was cut in the fencing of an enclosure for langur monkeys, but none had escaped.

Fact SHED

■ Emperor tamarin monkeys are native to the Amazon and are known for their distinctive whiskers.
■ They only grow to around 9-10in (23-26cm) although their tail can be almost twice that length. They only weigh around 18 ounces (500g).

Worst of all, a lappet-faced vulture was found dead at the zoo with what was described as an unusual wound. The 35-year-old bird, known as Pin, was one of only 6,500 lappet-faced vultures left in the world.

Police are trying to identify a man seen wandering around the zoo before the incidents and zoo officials have now installed more security cameras and increased patrols.
